APOLLO 19 SATURN V FIRST STAGE

The mighty Saturn V was a three-stage rocket used by NASA to support the Apollo program and later Skylab, the first American space station. The first stage, known as the S-IC, is 138 feet long and 33 feet in diameter and could produce more than 7.5 million pounds of thrust from five massive F-1 engines. During the Apollo program, the Saturn V moon rockets were built at NASA's Michoud Assembly Facility in New Orleans and then transported to Stennis Space Center in Mississippi for engine testing. The few S-ICs that still exist today were either test articles or what remain of cancelled flights. This piece was originally slated for the cancelled Apollo 19 mission, and would have lofted Biloxi-native and Apollo 13 Lunar Module Pilot Fred Haise to the last manned mission to the moon.
